WHITE WALLED ROMANCE

RAJAH, the Siamese cat, sat jealously guarding the telephone ringing merrily near the bed. Patty Royce hurried from her vanity table, where she had been applying her makeup, and brushed Rajah aside as she reached for the instrument. It was Mal Tanner on the phone. She was thrilled. Who wouldn't be?

"I'm practically ready, Mal!" she said excitedly.

Setting down the phone, Patty tried to stroke Rajah's sleek brown back but the cat stared Patty out of countenance, so she went back to her mirror. If she had more than ten minutes to do a half-hour's preparation she would have taken more time to get in the good graces once more of the Siamese. Rajah's proud hurt expression bothered her. But this was the mid-year prom and Mal Tanner was taking her. It would be the season's highlight and probably the only prom in the town's history to be held in Garvin's vacant barn! Unfinished work in remodeling the high school's auditorium made it impossible to hold the prom there. The committee had got busy and the mid-year prom had turned into a barn dance!

Tonight Mal drove up in the family car and its heavy white-walled tires crackled over the crusted snow, where Mr. Garvin had used his bulldozer to clear a parking space.

"Oh, fun!" Patty laughed. "If we don't freeze!"

"You won't," Mal said with a chuckling superiority. "The committee hired Honor Bright to stoke the wood burner. This is no ordinary dance, Chick! Everything for everybody!"

That was why Mal was such a prize to go out with! He was always thinking up the cleverest ways of saying things! It kept you on your toes. "You're funny, Mal," she said, "but who on earth is Honor Bright?"

Mal feigned surprise. "You don't know?" he asked. "Why who would it be but old Strive and Succeed? Walt the Whistler!"

"Oh, no! You mean Walt Wilson?" Patty laughed hard at that to cover up an embarrassment and a pang of conscience. Walt had asked Patty to go to the prom before Mal had and she had told him she had already been invited by someone else. Then she had been on pins and needles for fear that Mal would not ask her.

The committee had done a good job of cleaning and decorating the barn. Mal led Patty past a whistling stag line toward a table at the edge of the dance floor. "You're a hit, chick!" Mal whispered.

Laurence Lerner, with Edna Kennedy, stopped by at their table. Edna's gushing sweetness over Patty's new off-the-shoulder white-and-silver evening dress told her Edna was simply green with envy. The evening was starting beautifully. The saxes were mellow under the blare of brass. Edna said: "Van Burley's band is simply tops!" Laurence Lerner took the hint and grabbed Edna's hand, leading her toward the floor.

Mal rose. "Let's swing it, chick," he said.

Patty shook her head. "No swing, Mal. Waltz coming up!"

It was as if they were made to dance together. Smooth. Gliding. Hesitating. Then gliding. Everybody turned to look. It was heaven. When the break came Mal was suave, applauding not too much, but enough to be complimentary. A hand rested lightly on Patty's shoulder. She turned smiling, quickly sobering, seeing Walt Wilson. For he was serious, seeming to have an almost worshipful look in his eyes. "Save a dance for me, will you, Patty?" he said.

Patty was about to nod agreement, but Mal sneered, "Been taking lessons?" and just then the music started, and Mal led her off. As she glided away she called back to Walt apologetically, "They're—they're taken! I'm awfully sorry!"

The look on Walt's face, the hurt in it, somehow reminded her of the cat Rajah. She determined, however, to refuse to let anything mar the wonderful evening. Therefore she tried doubly hard to be cheerful and suddenly found it was a strain to do so. The enthusiasm was forced, the bubbling joy was missing, and the reason was because she realized that Walt knew she was lying. It was too early in the evening for her program to be filled completely.

It might have been all right, anyway, if Mal had let well enough alone. But he was not that type. When they returned to their table Edna and Laurence Lerner already were there. So were Billy Greenwood and Josephine Fable. Mal ordered cokes all around.

"The boy scout tried to cut in on my girl," Mal said. Everyone laughed.

Billy Greenwood lifted his coke. "To Walt Wilson! May his fires keep burning!"

Laurence Lerner grinned. "And like him, may they never smoke!"

Even Patty laughed at that, but her heart was not in the merriment. She felt ashamed and miserable. She tried to ease her conscience by saying, "Leave Walt alone. He's okay!"

Patty suddenly discovered a peculiar point of Mal's character. He could not bear to surrender the spotlight to another. Laurence Lerner's witticism forced a laugh from his lips, but there was a strange light in his eyes that told Patty Mal was going to go him one better if it killed him. He looked about him a moment as if searching for something. Then he said, "There's a draft in here!"

Billy Greenwood laughed. "You're crazy, Mal! It's even too warm!"

Mal rose. He went toward the door. Patty saw at once what was in Mal's mind. Beside the door was a draft regulator for the wood-burning furnace in the cellar of the barn. She went after him. "No, Mal! That's going too far!" she exclaimed. But Mal Tanner kept Patty away with one arm, while he shut off the draft damper.

"You're horrid!" Patty said and she meant it.

Smoke began to pour up through the heat register beneath the north window and through the door leading toward the cellar. Kids began to choke and cough and call for Walt Wilson. Mal Tanner yelled, "Hey, where's the janitor!"

Patty ran for the stairs leading down the heater room. A puff of hot air struck her in the face. Smoke curled and swirled up the stairs. Behind her Mal was laughing, calling after her. "Don't be a wet blanket!"

Patty kept going. "Walt!" she called out. She couldn't find him. The heater room was filled with smoke and was hot and stuffy. Her eyes began to burn. The smoke was too thick now to enable her to see. She turned about, confused, groping back toward what she thought was the direction of the stairs. She touched a solid wall. She could not breathe and sank to her knees. Near the floor the air was just slightest bit fresher. But now she was in panic. "Mal!" she called out. "Mal!"

A fresh gust of wind came to her and a form stood over her, lifting her, leading her toward fresh air again. Her throat was raw with every breath, but the deep breaths of air she took were delicious. Now she could see again and she looked startled. "Walt! I thought you were Mal!"

"You're a little late for him," Walt said. "Look!"

She could scarcely believe her eyes. A car on white-walled tires was roaring away.

"Why the— the coward!" Patty exclaimed. "But . . . Walt! The barn!"

"It won't burn, Patty. I saw Mal turn the damper off and so thought I'd give him some of his own medicine. I went to the heater room and disconnected the connection with upstairs. When he tried to open the draft again he couldn't. Probably thought he was burning the barn down." Walt laughed quietly. "He can dish it out. But he doesn't seem able to take it!"

Patty felt foolish. Walt in his quiet way had turned the laugh on Mal and Mal certainly COULDN'T TAKE IT! Moreover he'd run away to hide!

Walt said, "See, the smoke's clearing up now! I fixed the damper when I heard you in there." He waited a moment, then added, "I'm sorry if I spoiled your evening, Patty. I didn't mean to."

Patty was learning a lot of things. About Mal. About Walt. She was glad it was dark in the doorway so Walt wouldn't see the tears of regret in her eyes. Regret for her unpardonable conduct. She said finally, "I should have danced with you, Walt. I—I could have! I'm a complete rat."

Walt took her hand. "Not on my report card," he told her. "But I won't embarrass you by asking you to dance now. When you're ready to go, I'll drive you home."

"I want to go now," Patty said.

Patty, relaxing happily against the worn upholstery of Walt's old battered crate, breathed deeply and sighed. Walt said, "This is no white-walled job, but it'll get us to the movies Saturday—if you'll go!" He hesitated, then continued. "I can't even ask you to stop for hot chocolate now. I've got to get back to the heater before someone else gets a bright idea."

At her front door she said, "Thanks, Walt. Thanks heaps." Walt paused a moment, then suddenly, impulsively, he bent down and kissed her. On the lips, too.

She said all at once: "I don't care about the tires, Walt. If they don't hold up we can take a bus. Or even walk."

As his jalopy rattled away, she thought happily, It's funny how much better it is when you clear your conscience! Inside the house she would make up with Rajah, too!
